Queer Story about Mr Polk.

Colonel John Brownlow, a son of the famons fighting parson, tells mo there is a latter in existence, written by James K. Poik a few weaks before he was nominated at Baldmore. In the latter Polk writes to Andrew Jackson Donelson, endeavoring to get the support of 'Od Hickory' to make bim Vice President. After stating his qualifications for the place, he closes as follows:
"I hope the Tennessee delegation will exert its influence in ma bahalf as the candidate for Vice President. This has been the ambition of my life. Four years ago I desired the nomination, but I gave way to others, and now I hops my friends will support me."

"The Tennersee delegation," said Colonel Brownlow, "rad no idea of making Polk their candidate for the Presidency, and their support of him as Vice President was morely nomical. The convention, however, did not know this. The friends of the other party were fighting bard, and it was in one of the bitterest of the strugges that, merely to divert be attention of the overention, Major Doneison arose and nominated James K. Polk as a candidate for the Presidency Dansieon was supposed to be the mouth-piece of 'Old Hickory," and the irfluence of Andrew Jackson was such that this of Audrew Jackson was such that this caused a stempede towerd Polk, and he was nominated. When Andrew Jackson heard of it he was not pleased. He had a contempt for Polk, because Polk would not light a duel with Henry A. When when he pulled his nose during his say in Washington as Speaker of the Hones of Representatives."

"What d d Polk eay as to his membratio. ?"

I asked.
"They tell a queer intery concerning it in "They tell a queer story concerning it in Tennessee," replied Colonel Brownlow. The news was announced to him by his brother, William Polk, and James K. Polk would not believe it. William Polk was a much brighter man than James K. Polk. He was the Tom Corwin of Tennessee in his day, and was noted as a way. He could tell exertise by the yard, and President Lincolo, who knew him well, was very fond of hir. He was ruined, however, by deinking, and it was a curious thing that drink made his face white rather than red. He drank a great deal, but he had no red. He drank a great deal, but he had no bloseom on his nose.
"Wail, William Polk was the flist man to get the news of James K. Polk's nominatrying a petty $10 justice of the peace case in the rows, and he came into the lawyer's office and interrupted the trial, saying:

"'Jim, have you heard the news from

"The future President replied that he had

"Well, Jim, the nominations are meds, and I am black blacked if you are not nom-nated for the Presidency."

"James K. Po'k laughed, and so did the rest of the crowd. They all thought it was one of Bill Polk's jokes, but they soon learned it was truth, and Polk made an active canvass during the campaign. Andrew Jackson helped bim because he was the democratic nominee. He didn's like the pil', but he took it.

"Precident Polk was killed by anxiety and hard work," Colonel Brownlow wenton. "He was laid in his grave by the Mexican war, and in some way he get the idea that the responsibility for that war rested on him. He was conscience stricken and felt himself responsible for the lives lost in it. This feeling preyed upon him, and the anxlety and hard work connected with his position brought him to the grave. When he entered the White House he was young, straight, black haired, and about 50 years of When he came out, he was a stooped, wrinkled old man, whose helr was gray and whose step was feeble. He went back to Nashville, and he died in a few mouths af-ter he left the Presidency."

"Polk was a Presbyterlan, was he not?" said I.
"No," replied Colonel Brownlow, "be was a Methodist, and I knew the Methodist preacher who baptized him. His wife was a Presbyterian, and it is probable that the statement that he was a Presbyterian himself comes from that fact."— Wash. Cor.
